A work of literature can be thought of as involving four different and potentially quite separate time frames: author time (when the work was originally written or published); narrator time (when the narrator in a work of fiction supposedly narrates the story); plot time (when the action depicted actually takes place); and reader or audience time (when a reader reads the work or sees it performed).

Space and Time in Language and Literature

Narratives occur in a space and unfold in time. In narrative art, the artist chooses how to portray the story, represent the space, and how to shape time within the artwork. Narrative art can be categorized into various types, also known as modes or styles. A piece of artwork is not limited to only one type of narrative. An artwork may have a narrative type as a whole, as well as portions of the artwork itself that depict separate types of narratives.

The author analyses the narrative techniques used to represent such spaces alongside their cultural significance. Each chapter connects narrative deformation of space with historical problematic of time, and demonstrates the cognitive and perceptual primacy of narrative in representing, imagining and apprehending new forms of space and time.

Narrative Space And Time Representing

According to Bakhtin (1981c: 250), chronotopes, 'functioning as the primary means for materializing time in space,' emerge as the 'organizing centers for the fundamental narrative events of the novel'--as centers for 'concretizing representation,' as the place where 'the knots of narrative are tied and untied.'

Narrative Space

A narrative is defined by David Bordwell as 'a chain of events in cause-effect relationship occurring in time and space'. Although causality (and time and space) is central to narrative, films may also make use of different principles, such as parallelism , whereby two separate lines of action are intercut in order to allow us to compare and contrast.
